Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Kilrogan Cottage: A Novel It was an important evening to the Wesleyan Methodists of Erna, this evening of the early spring, which comes to Ireland in such tender bloom and fragrance, for the Annual Missionary Meeting was to be held - brethren from Ceylon, from Caffraria, from countries whose chief interest lay in being so remote, so pagan, so perishing for lack of missionaries - Wesleyan Methodist missionaries. The people of the Wesleyan Society were walking in groups up the high, narrow street, at the top of which stood the preaching-house. The plain old people still called it so, though the younger and more ambitious members of the society preferred naming it the Wesleyan Chapel. An oblong, rough-cast, white building - at the sides tall windows with fan-light tops; one of the same on each side the door, and across the dim glass of these slanted the staircases, leading, one on either hand, up to the small end gallery. The guardians of its weekday renovation and its Sunday sanctity were lame Davy and his wife Peggy, an old couple of Scotch descent, as are so many of the people of Fermanagh, the county in which the small town of Erna stood. At this moment Peggy, with black gown and clean white cap, moved about the chapel, giving the last flip of her duster to form and pew and reading-desk. Old Davy carried a long pole with a lighted taper at its end, and with this he slowly and solemnly illuminated the mould-candles in the tin sconces hung on the walls, the brass branches at the pulpit, and, lastly, the old spider-like chandelier which hung from...
