This was in spite of the fact that the specimens were mounted after dehydrating without staining straight in Canada balsam and then examined with a-iv objective, so that even representatives of the nannoplankton should not have escaped notice. This condition may be explained by a consideration of the probable course by which food reaches the mesenteron. In the first place, the food must consist of organisms contained in the currents of water drawn into the gall through the respiratory apertures. It is hardly necessary to repeat the statement of early observers that the crab does not devour the coral polyps. Moreover, the smaller members of the plankton alone can enter the gall (in the closed galls at least) and I have little doubt that the bulk of the food consists of...
